Nedko Solakov is from Bulgaria. His art can be mixture of anxiety, humour, compulsion and social critique. His installations can be hilarious but are often also elusive interventions. He creates improbable situations from which to draw out a narrative that is played out through various objects and activities. With this work he proposed to explore the difference in value systems between himself and his teenage son and daughter. They were asked to determine what would be exhibited here and then travel to Ireland to install the work. The popular culture references in the television and toy selected by the younger Solakovs do possibly point to a different understanding of the world. Sometimes it is not that difficult to expect your children to be conceptual artists, and with this piece where the roles are exchanged, we see different generations possibly untied through art.
