Message

Sally Timmons is from Dublin. She is involved with a public art project called Via that places artworks along a street in Dublin. It is an artist-lead initiative similar to the early days of this exhibition that arose to give local artists and opportunity to exhibit contemporary art to local audiences. She studied photography and has an interest in visual archives. The video is like a forgotten archive box or message that has been found which contains random information about an individual. This is not unlike the way archives function as they contain mixed bits of information that when retrieved and collated contribute toward a history that is always under construction, always being written and re-written depending on what information is used. Here it is the history of an individual that is under re-construction, but technology is letting her down, distorting the message, omitting crucial facts.

Dieter Buchhart
How to Build a House

Dieter Buchhart is from Vienna where he also lives. He has shown quite recently in Cork. He has an interest in involving people into his artworks which explore how identity is created by rules or codes which is influenced by his mixed studies in art and science. This video shows how even the construction of a building can parallel the construction of reality. The text that appears every so often is taken from a variety of sources to do with house building, drawing in other political and media references into the simple act of building a wall which I guess can be a metaphor.
